Excerpt from Back to Rome: Being a Series of Private Letters, Et Addressed to an Anglican Clergyman

The nature of man is thoroughly miserable without God. Some men are not conscious of the cause of this misery; this, however, does not prevent the fact of their being miserable. for the most part, they conceal the fact as well as possible from themselves, by occupying their minds with society, sport, frivolity of all kinds; or, if intellectually disposed, with science, art, literature, business, etc. This, however, is but to fill the starving belly with husks. I know from experience the intellectual distractions of scientific research, philosophical speculation, and artistic pleasures; but am also well aware that even when all are taken together and well sweetened to taste, in respect of consequent reputation, means, social position, etc., the whole concoction is but as high confectionary to a starving man. He may cheat himself for a time - especially if he be a strong man - into the belief that he is nourishing himself by denying his natural appetite; but soon finds he was made for some altogether different kind of food, even though of much less tastefulness as far as the palate is concerned. Some men, indeed, never acknowledge this articularly or distinctly even to themselves, yet always show it plainly enough to others. Take, e.g., that last infirmity of noble minds.
