

Challenges and Opportunities for the Obama Administration in Central Asia

President Obama has outlined a strategy for the war in Afghanistan that strongly connects our prosecution of that war to our policy in Pakistan and internal developments there as a necessary condition of victory. But the strategy has also provided for a new logistics road through Central Asia. The author argues that a winning strategy in Afghanistan depends as well upon the systematic leveraging of the opportunity provided by that road and a new coordinated nonmilitary approach to Central Asia. That approach would rely heavily on improved coordination at home and the more effective leveraging of our superior economic power in Central Asia to help stabilize the region. In this fashion we would help Central Asia meet the challenges of extremism, of economic decline due to the global economic crisis, and help provide political stability regionally.
