Having published at Oxford, in 1633, an edition of the first epistle of Clemens Rotnanus to the Corinthians, in Greek and Latin, the text of which is included in the Alexandrian MS., he was encouraged to put forward, in 1637, his Catena on Job, which contained the entire text of that book transcribed from the same Codex. This book was printed in the Greek types of the Royal printing office, purchased under the peculiar circumstances already detailed.¹ After this, says Gough, Young formed the design of printing the entire text of the Codex in facsimile type, of which, in 1643, he printed a Specimen, consisting of the first chapter of Genesis, with notes, and left behind him scholia as far as to the fifteenth chapter of Numbers¹ Of this specimen, unfortunately, no copy can be discovered; although as to the existence of such a document there is no lack of contemporary evidence. In his Prolegomena to the London Polyglot of 1657, Bishop Walton, who had made a careful study of the Codex, and availed himself freely of Youngs notes, distinctly states that he had seen the specimen, and that the proposal to carry through the work had been discouraged by the advice of Youngs friends.³ Walton shows a few words of the Alexandrian Greek, poorly cut in wood, among the specimens in his Prolegomena: a circumstance which would suggest that in 1657 the matrices used for Junius facsimile, if in existence, were not then available. Waltons statement was confirmed by Grabe, Mill, and others, who made a study of the Codex and its history; and in 1707 Youngs biographer and successor in the task of preparing the Codex f...
