The Duke of Mayenne was at Lyons, and Alphonso Ornano was sent to arrest him, but without success; for directly the death of Guise was known, two leaguers had quitted Blois to warn the remaining hope of their party; and they had no time to spare, for Mayenne quitted Lyons by one gate as Ornano entered by another. He went at once to Dijon, where he was governor. A similar activity, on the part of the league, anticipated the King in getting possession of Orleans.f Henry was urged to take the field, to recal the army from Poictou, and prevent Mayenne from collecting his forces. He thought, however, that he should be joined by the catholics of the league, whose aim being more to suppress the Huguenots than to assist the Guises, would cheerfully help him in subduing the King of Navarre, and thus enable him to restore order. He contented himself therefore with publishing a declaration, justifying his conduct towards the Guises, and renewing the edict of union, to shew his attachment to the catholic faith. II-Had he shewn himself before Orleans, his presence alone would have preserved that city from joining in the rebellion; but he ridiculed the advice which was given him both to that effect, and also to unite with the King of Navarre, a measure which ultimately he could not avoid. Soon after the Cardinal of Guise was killed, two counsellors and a clerk were sent to the Archbishop of Lyons, to question him upon the charges against the Duke of Guise. The Archbishop told them, that as they were laymen they had no jurisdiction over him, and that he
