

Our Eternal Homes (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Our Eternal Homes
Voyagers to a distant port, travelers to a far-off country, emigrants from a land of destitution to a land of hope, desire to know somewhat of the character of their several destinations. This desire is not unnatural. Indeed, we should reasonably consider indifference as an indication and a proof of strange shallowness of thought or of feeling. The warmer the hopes that point to that far-off resting-place, the keener will be the anxiety to learn all that can be known as to that resting-place. Delight in contemplating its prospects may be measured by the disposition to inquire into its character. Men, as reasonable beings, must necessarily prefer to investigate most those subjects that take the strongest hold upon their interest. We think the most constantly of that which we love best, and desire to obtain information thereon, to enable r.s the more fully to think of it. So far from this being unnatural, it is the very necessity of our rational nature; and as such, anxiety to learn something about heaven is at once God-designed and God-given. Nor is such a disposition puerile. About the Publisher
