Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: ...in J. C. Liljegrens Runliira, Stockholm, 1832, appendix, it is already somewhat simpler and approaches the Kensington forms. The two are the same alphabet, the only important differences being clearly due to the scribe himself.<sup>38</sup> <sup>32</sup> Alund records several cases, p. 79. <sup>33</sup> As late as 1840 there was published in Upsala a work entitled: Svenskt og Runskt Calendarium in till ahret 1840 samt Bekrifning Ofver Runstafven. See Thorsen, p. 80. <sup>35</sup> These facts from Alund. <sup>36</sup> Thorsens statement is as follows: Etiam hodlerno die in suprema Dalecarliae regione ab incolis parcecise Klfdalen Runae retinentur. <sup>37</sup> See Dalarne inscriptions of recent times in Fomvannen, 1906. <sup>38</sup> Or to local variation, and in the case of the runes for e, o, I, literary influence (ballad books, rune-lists, modern readers with runes in.) A most significant feature of the correspondence between the two is the symbol employed in them for d. We saw that in the old series the spirant th and dh was represented by b and d by T. This we are forced to assume on the part of a scribe of the fourteenth century ignorance of the runic letter d used in his time, which is not conceivable, or ignorance of the pronunciation of the time, which is impossible, or else that the writing of thag for dag, and theth for dodh must originate with a modern scribe who is ignorant of the pronunciation of the time, as well as the runic system. Now, however, another explanation at once suggests itself. In the Dalecarlian runic alphabet there is no rune for the spirants dh and th for these sounds disappeared from the language in the eighteenth century and no longer exist in Swedish except locally and sporadically. But this modern runic alphabet came to employ the rune for d, owing to its greater similarity to D.M Thus th...
