Excerpt: ... But what this prince was, and whether, and how far forth excusable in point of state, conscience, or honour, a diligent observation of his actions, together with a conjuncture of the times, will (I conceive) better declare to the judicious reader, than any factious relation on what side whatsoever. To conclude; I wish I could leave Henry VIII. in his grave. Because these honourable solemnities are not in any of our historians particularly set down, take this short account of it, from a volume in the Office of Arms. The chest wherein the corpse of Henry was laid, stood in the midst of the privy-chamber, with lights and divine service said about him, with masses, obsequies, and continual watch, made by the chaplains and gentlemen of the privy-chamber, in their order and course, night and day, for five days, till the chapel was ready; where was a goodly hearse, with eighty square tapers, every light containing two foot in length, in the whole iSoo weight of wax, (another relation writeth about 2000 weight,) garnished with pensils, eschutcheons, banners and bannerols of descents; and at the four corners, banners of saints, beaten in fine gold upon damask; with a majesty thereover of rich cloth of tissue, and vallance of black silk, and fringe of black silk and gold; and the barriers without the hearse, and the sides and floor of the said chapel, covered with black cloth to the high altar; and at the sides and ceiling of the said chapel, set with banners and standards of St. George and others. The znd of February the corpse was removed, and brought into the chapel by the Lord Great Master and officers of the household, and there placed within the hearse, under a pall of rich cloth of tissue, garnished with eschutcheons, and a rich cloth of gold set with precio...
