Excerpt: ... ON THE DISTRIBUTION OF BIRDS IN GREAT BRITAIN DURING THE NESTING SEASON. Reprinted from the Ibis, 1865. ALL books on British ornithology give some indication, more or less exact, of the range or distribution of the several birds. Still I am not aware that any one in this country has yet made this branch of ornithology a special subject of study, interesting as it is in itself, and important in many scientific points of view. Whether we wish to compare the respective range of the different branches of our Fauna and Flora, or to contrast their distribution in Great Britain with their range on the Continent, whether it is our object to estimate the effect of climate, prevailing winds, soil, geographical position, or the influence of man, all these most interesting questions can only be properly investigated when we have sufficiently exact data in each of the classes. Thus it is hoped that an attempt to illustrate the distribution of our birds on a regular and methodical plan will not be without its use. Our census is necessarily limited to the nesting-season, that being the only time when the birds can be treated as stationary; and, for the sake of uniformity, we have adopted the districts already employed by Mr. H. C. Watson in his great work on the geographical distribution of British plants, the Cybele Britannica. The present outline is confessedly imperfect, not only from the insufficient number of observers, but because it has been thought better in many cases to withhold information of a doubtful character, rather than run the risk of mixing good with bad authority; and as no pains have been spared to investigate every disputed point, it is hoped that the results may be accepted as tolerably accurate so far as they go. Had our scheme any claim to co...
