Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: ...were to be from the territory, formerly called New-Plymouth. The four gentlemen named for this purpose in the charter, were Thomas Hinckley, William Bradford, John Walley, and Barnabas Lothrop. Governor Sloughter having arrived at New York, previous to the arrival of Sir William Phips with the new charter of Massachusetts, attempted to exercise his authority in the jurisdiction of New Plymouth, and issued his orders as though it was a part of the province of New York; but the arrival of Phips at Boston, with the charter, 14th May, 1692, occasioned their immediate suspension. A court having been summoned by the new governor, on the 8th of June following, the province of Massachusetts Bay proceeded to exercise her newly acquired authority without interruption. She had emerged from her colonial state, to be a province of the empire; she had become sufficiently powerful to attract the notice of the monarch; and her democratic tendencies were henceforth to be more carefully watched by the ministers of the crown. New Plymouth quietly submitted to her younger sister, and the amalgamation of the two colonies was soon perfected. See Belknap Hist. of NewHampshire, (Farmers edit.) 123. i Daviti note, Mortons Memorial, 473--477. The last general court of the colony was summoned, and met at Plymouth on the first Tuesday of July--and the last exercise of power by that body was the appointment of a day of solemn fasting and humiliation. The days of the colony of New Plymouth were numbered! The population of the colony at this period was about thirteen thousand. There was little trade, and a heavy debt impended over them. The whole personal property of individuals was but little more than sufficient to discharge the general debt, which had grown out of t...
