Not illustrated. 1844 Excerpt: ...Your Committee are further of opinion, that a more extensive mode of publication should be provided for, than that required by the 36th clause of the bill. Another most objectionable provision introduced here (from the English law) is, that of setting up the officer who has charge of making out the lists for revision, (in English counties, the overseer of the parish, in Irish counties, the high constable of the barony,) as a general ObJector. The power to add (whether in a list of registered votes to be revised, or a list of claimants) the word dead before the name of any person whom the officer shall have reasonable cause to believe to be dead, might not be objectionable; and even a power of objecting, confined to specific grounds of objection, within the knowledge of the officer, or which he shall have reasonable cause to believe, might perhaps be admissible; but this English system, which attaches a power without a responsibility, would be sure to convert the officer into a partisan, make him an instrument in the hands of one faction or another, and destroy the public confidence in his integrity. The extent to which vexatious opposition might be carried under such a system may be judged of from the following considerations.--1st. A registered voter may be driven to prove his whole qualification every year by the officer (overseer, or high constable) writing the word objected against his name on the lists. 2ndly. The same burden may be tirown upon him annually, by any other person proving that he gave such a notice of objection as the act allows, without a shadow of proof being offered in support of it. 3rdly. Although there be no objection to his title, but merely an objection on the
