Kinney bursts upon the scene with his short play that covers the lives of a couple as they deal with life's victories and disappointments. Like a Barnett Newman painting or a Mies van der Rohe design, the words are stripped bare of all but exactly what is required. Although we never learn the man or woman's name, the color of their hair, or any personal details about them other than a hint of their ancestry and occupations, we identify with them through their words. At times funny or sexy and at others tense or sad, the couple's dialogue forces us to think about relationships, gender differences, and the way people cope with loss. By choosing to write in the form of a play, Kinney allows us to fit the couple into our own world. With the intimacy of the conversations we feel at times a voyeur and at times like the writer is shining a mirror on us. All of the author's proceeds from these sales will be donated to a not-for-profit charity to support orphans of the earthquake that struck Haiti in January 2010.
