Excerpt: ... II The Germans At Bielostock I met a peasant soldier from Ossovets, a dispatch-bearer. How are you getting on out there? I asked. They run, said he. Thats an important victory, isnt it? I replied. Their Emperor was there, somewhere about Ossovets, said the soldier. If wed only known in time wed a taken him. But he would have been in a very safe position, I urged. Oh, wed a had him, even if we had lost thousands. If theyd told us, we would have done anything to take him. Hes more than a flag -- hes their Tsar. This is the spirit of the Russian soldiers just now. If their officers ask them to take a hill they will take it, or storm a fort against terrible artillery fire, they will storm it. They have got going, they are on the wave of a tremendous national enthusiasm. They fight with cries and shouts, with songs. They have to be constantly reproved for marching too fast, and for treading on one anothers heels at the fording of the rivers. They need no band, no banjo to spur the rearguard to a walk. They are very heavily clad, clumsily shod, burdened with a heavy kit, from which dangle pots and kettles. They live on the most frugal diet, and do not grumble when they starve. They sleep under the open sky these wet, cold nights of autumn. They have the longest patience in the world, and yet they have also an extraordinary verve and eagerness. This is a wonderful combination, emotion on a foundation of patience. The Germans are stubborn, they are persistent and determined. They are condemnatory and angry, and are capable of a fine rage. They are self-confident and plucky. They are what we English call nasty. As brutes they have most in common with the wild boar, most vicious and dangerous of animals. On
