Not illustrated. 1745 Excerpt: ...of T hath been affirmed by some, that Mixture and Limitation is inconsistent to successiveonarchy, as if, wherever Sovereignty is entailed to a Succession, it must needs be absolute: But I must profess I cannot see how it can stand with Truth: Rather I think, that both elective and hereditary Monarchy are indifferently capable of Absoluteness or Limitation. If a free and not pre-engaged People to any Government, by publick Compacts yield up themselves to a Person, to be commanded by his Will as their supreme Law, during his natural Life, and no longer, Can it be denied, but that he is an absolute, and yet elective Monarch? Unless-you will say he is not absolute, because he cannot, by his Will, as by a Law, bind them to elect his Son to succeed him, and change their Government into hereditary. But his being limited in this Clause doth not disparagehis Sovereignty, or make his Power of Government limited, because this belongs not to present Government, but is a mere Provision for the Future. Again, is the Power of Ruling, according to a Law, by Consent, conveyed to one Person, and his Heirs to succeed after him, how this should come to be absolute, and the Entailment should overthrow the Constitution, I cannot imagine: If the whole Latitude of Power may be by a People made hereditary, sure a Proportion may as well; unless the Limitation be such as includes a Repugnancy to be perpetual. Indeed, this Instating of a Succession makes that Power irrevocable, during the Continuance of that Succession: But it makes it neither greater nor less in the Successor than was in his Progenitors from whom he derives it.
