Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: ...England. There was nothing in either case like ours. They had not liberty, and they sought for it through various opposing channels; we had liberty, and we threw it away, at the bid of a mob of ignorant and fiery fanatics, than whom the world never saw wretches more graceless and godless. Men not fit to live, and not prepared to die! Traitors alike to their country and humanity! Despised by every patriot, and abhorred by every Christian! Great only in teaching the art of hate, let their own science be returned to them again. If it be lawful to love one's country, it would seem to be just to hate those who have destroyed it--The learned Professor Hugh Falutins first lecture at Irving Hall was a great success, as all such meritorious performances are among the intelligent people of this city. The venerable Mr. Bryant presided. The platform was graced by the presence of the editors of the Trilntne, Times, Pod, Advertiser, and one or two strange gentlemen of a very dark complexion, supposed to be a delegation from Africa: The learned and accomplished Professor came forward at precisely eight o'clock, and said: Ladies and Gentlemen--The subject of this lecture is The Ideal World. By the ideal world we must understand the necessary, the permanent, the immutable, which is not only antecedent and pre-existent, to all other things, but also explanatory and representative of them, as containing in it eminently, and after an intelligible manner, all that is in this natural world, according to which it was made, and in conformity to which is all the Truth, Keality, Order, Beauty, and Perfection of nature does consist, arftl is to lie measured. (Applause.) The Bystem of things existing after this manner is what is called the Ideal World, which is no...
