Not illustrated. 1814 Excerpt: ...to say a few words on that subject. To bring the enemy to an action was my object, and being confident that general Washington was studious to avoid it, unless under most favourable circumstances, some art and some hazard was necessary to accomplish my purpose. The movements made on this occasion, which may be found in my letter of the 10th of October, 1777, were not repugnant to sound principles; and it is no small consolation to me to know, independent of the event, that I have the opinions of the most judicious officers in the army on the spot, to support a measure which some gentlemen, from what authority I know not, have been pleased to censure. But at the same time that I am reflected upon on one hand, for hazarding too much, I am blamed on the other, for not making the action more decisive, and for not following up the victory more closely. To demonstrate the impracticability of a vigorous pursuit in a hostile country (but more particularly in America than in any other country I have seen) or the inutility of attempting it farther than was done, in the peculiar state of the army at that time, Delaware, in order to be nearer New York than if I went up the Chesapeak, as I once intended, and which route I preferred to that of the Delaware, provided the enemy discovered a disposition to defend Pennsylvania. This letter was received by the noble lord on the 2d of August. My next letter was dated the 30th of August, from the head of Elk; but it happened that the Swallow packet, carrying that letter, had a very uncommon length of voyage, and did not reach England till the 28th of October, which accounts for his lordships having been two months without hearing from me, my letter of the 16th of July having reached England on the 32d of August. The noble lor...
