The Scotch, at the crisis of the union, were most earnest in their entreaties for the means to rise and proclaim the son of James II. and Maria Beatrix, by the title of James VIII., King of Scotland; but every time Maria broached the subject, Louis XIV. put her off till the spring of 1708, at which period he resolved to send an expedition, headed by the prince, her son, in person, to make a descent on the coast of Scotland. The fleet was prepared at Dunkirk, but the Chevalier de St. George (the name which the prince assumed in this adventure), when about to embark, was seized with measles: this caused a delay of several days; and when, at last, Fourbin, the French admiral, put to sea, the weather proved foul and stormy, and on his entering the Frith of Forth, near Edinburgh, the English fleet chased him and took one of his men-of-war, which so alarmed him that he would not permit the prince to land, and returned to France without attempting, much less accomplishing, the presumed object of his mission. In the absence of her beloved son, Maria had retired with her daughter, Louisa, to her favourite convent at Chaillot, and there, assisted by the nuns, offered up prayers for his safety and success. His return and disappointment troubled, but did not astonish her; for a few nights previously an old woman had appeared to her in a dream, and told her that this time he would not land; a vision which both herself and the superstitious nuns interpreted as a sure omen of the failure of the expedition. This attempted invasion of Scotland caused an alarming run upon the Bank of England for gold, and so terrified Queen Anne, that her cabinet set a...
