Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: ...issues arising would be better than a regular congress, is really without weight. Such questions would constitute only a small proportion of the whole number and could be satisfactorily dealt with by committees. The general congress would, of course, not prevent the calling of special conferences if there should be any occasion for them, as would not be at all likely. Even purely European or American questions, if there should be such, could easily be treated apart by the representatives from these sections of the world. The world is not likely, however, to move much in halves hereafter, as it has done too much in the past. We commend this memorial to the careful study of all under whose eyes it may fall, and ask that an effort be made to understand the real nature of the measure proposed before it is rejected or ignored. It was suggested by the practical movements of the time, by what has actually been done, by what the nations themselves recognize as an imperative necessity. There is nothing of the visionary about it. The proposed stated congress would work immediately if established, with even more certainty than the Hague Court has worked; and it is difficult to conceive of anything which would do more to cement the peoples of the world together, in mutual understanding, intelligent respect and genuine amity, and to prevent the recurrence of those miserable clashes which have so often disgraced the very name of man, than the regular meeting from time to time, in serious friendly council, for the promotion of the common good, of able and experienced representatives from all quarters of the globe. More Brutality. The Venezuela situation has not materially
