Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: ...English states. The later victories of the English, especially after their conversion to Christianity, led to conquests rather than settlements, and the population of many of the western districts of England remained chiefly British in blood. The hypothesis of the retention of a large British element in the English settlements receives much support from recent anthropological researches. The dark colour of hair which is held to denote the presence of the earlier stocks is found, according to the Report of the Anthropometric Committee of the British Association, to be more prevalent in many of the counties of the east and south of England than it is throughout the greater part of Wales. Even Dr. Beddoe, who dissents from the conclusions of the committee, does not regard the pure English and Scandinavian stocks, recognised by their characteristic fair tint, as accounting for more than a half of the population of the greater part of England. A portion of this dark element in England is no doubt of comparatively recent introduction, due to the various immigrations that have taken place from the Continent, and to the constant flow, since the sixteenth century, of the western population to the wealthier parts of the country. Some may have been introduced by the English invaders themselves, fair people as in the main they appear to have been. They came from lands previously trodden by at least two of the earlier races of Britain, remnants of which may have come in the English keels to wrest the land from their unrecognised kinsmen. The south-western peninsula, which had been isolated by English victories on the Severn, was the subject of much later conquest.

The remaining portion of Eoman Britain, south of the wall, had, shortly after the departure of the legions,...
